7 WAYS HOW YELLING AT OFFICIALS IS HURTING CHILDREN

1. They learn that mistakes are not okay. Yelling at officials can create an environment where mistakes are seen as unacceptable. This can lead to a lack of learning, as children may fear making mistakes and forgo learning from them.

2. They learn to make excuses. Yelling can create a perception that officials are not fair or impartial. This can lead to children making excuses for their performance or behavior, instead of looking for ways to improve.

3. They learn to give up when facing adversity. Yelling at officials can create a culture where giving up is considered a valid option. This can lead to children believing that they are not capable of overcoming challenges or obstacles.

4. They learn to disrespect authority. Yelling at officials can create a perception that authority figures are not to be respected. This can lead to children believing that they have the right to challenge or disrespect authority figures in other areas of their lives.

5. They have negative role models. Yelling at officials can create a negative role model for children. This can lead to children imitating the behavior of officials in their own interactions.

6. They learn to be rude. Yelling at officials can create a culture where rudeness is acceptable. This can lead to children believing that it is acceptable to be rude to others.

7. They learn to be selfish. Yelling at officials can create a perception that one's own needs are the most important. This can lead to children believing that their own needs are more important than the needs of others.

Adapted from: https://www.sportscoachaustralia.com/articles/hurting-children-in-sport